Indirect costs typically cover administrative expenses, facility maintenance, utilities, and other operational costs that are not directly tied to a specific project but are necessary for the institution's overall functioning. The research institution is responsible for covering its own indirect costs.

The intention behind Kure It's policy is to ensure that all funds are directed toward the actual research, maximizing the impact of the grant on advancing cancer research. The policy reflects a desire to focus as much financial support as possible on cancer research, ensuring that the money is used efficiently to make progress in this critical area. This policy aligns with Kure It's Mission to prioritize the direct advancement of underfunded cancer research, ensuring that more of the donated funds are used to find cures and better treatments for cancer.
